KGB Suppression and The Dogs

After the eradication of Khrushchev by the KGB in 1964, Leonid Brezhnev ordered the State and KGB to use harsh suppression methods, such as routine house searches to seize documents and continual monitoring of dissidents, to ensure that Khrushchev's theories would not come back and rise up to overthrow the Communist Party. This was also to make sure that anyone who denounced Stalinism would be suppressed and if necessary, killed.

The animals on the farm were suppressed from contact with Snowball, or any mention of Snowball. When the animals confessed of being in a link with Snowball for various crimes, the dogs acted quickly to suppress another rebellion and killed those animals.

Pg. 92-92 "The four pigs waited, trembling... Napoleon now called upon them to confess their crimes... Without... prompting, they confessed that they had been secretly in touch with Snowball... collaborated with him in destroying the windmill, and that they had entered into an agreement to Mr. Frederick... the dogs promptly tore their throats out... Three hens... came forward and stated that Snowball had appeared to them in a dream... to disobey Napoleon's orders. They, too, were slaughtered..."
